

Dear Sirs,

I believe that a person should expect a certain amount of privacy in their own domicile. Any unwanted intrusion, whether from the door or telephone, is a violation of privacy. For the same reason I should not tolerate a marketer setting up a business stall on my front lawn, I refuse to welcome them into my home via telephone. It is invasive, annoying, and a poor business model.

I do not wish exemptions to be made for television, radio, or any other media. This defeats the purpose of "do not call" legislation. Further, it allows future, fictitious business relationships to be forged with media and telemarketers, propagating the myth that I have somehow entered into a consensual, business relationship.

Please, heed the Public's wishes in this matter. Thank you.
